It's not clear to me why IE and others allow many more than one. (And how do you arrive at these bizarre numbers -- like, why do the letters not start with "S"? I've seen a lot of people doing this with the following CSS (with a link to the SVG that has the path replaced): I've used it for various similar purposes. It does work, but I've never really seen a good reason to do it that way. It's far easier to have the SVG in the actual DOM than to use a div as a fake-SVG container. I've also seen people use CSS to place buttons to the side of a div. Again, that makes sense, but there is a reason why CSS is used for positioning. While a div may give the impression of the button being floated to the right of the div, it's really being positioned relative to the body's margin. That means it's outside the flow and is not treated as a sibling of the div. In short, don't just use a div to emulate CSS. CSS is tricky, and a lot of people think that they can do everything they want to a div, and be done with it. That's a mistake. If they had it to do over again, they would use SVG and use CSS to place the SVG. It's not that simple.Q: Approve and reject link: how can I make it work when it's in a table? I'm using a table for an approval form in Sharepoint 2010. I want to have a "Request to approve" link on the left and a "Request to reject" link on the right. The problem is, the "request to approve" link is always active. How can I fix this? A: This is what I came up with, but it requires quite a lot of code, so it's not really an answer. If you have a different approach, please share it. 82157476af
